A new oilfield is discovered in the Indian Ocean. Within hours, OPEC changes its outputs, sales of natural gas futures slow, petroleum stocks spike, Greenpeace prepares a protest, and prices are down at your local pump. But before the world can react, your customers have already modified their portfolios, selected new oil-powered machinery, made a bid to develop the new oilfield, taken whatever steps they can to capitalize, because they were the first to know. Shouldn't they have found out from you?
